Tobias Holzlehner Cosmopolitan Xenophobia: Cultural Dynamics of Consumption and Ethnic Interaction in Vladivostok, Russia

Abstract:

The central focus of my dissetitan research is how, in the Baian city of Vladivostok, urban space and metropolitan knowledge are being negotiand reformulated between the diverging and converging ideological forces of xenophobia and cosmopolitanism. The dichotomous interdependence of these twoncepts has a long history Roussia. From the 1850s to the present reforms and social transfiations depended on an increased dialogue with other nations and influences from the surrounding world. Reference at alternative models outside of Russia in fields from banking to human rights. Yet, nationalistic coueterms and official xenophobia opposed these cosmopolitan tendencies. datowa Vladivostok is a city in change. The reopening of its commercial potential international shipping lines, the migration of Chinese traders into the city, the opening of markets, ittflux of foreign goods, and the development of new political structures have led to fundametransformations. This study will investigate how the local Russian population of Vladivostok regives and responds to transnational movements and new commodity flows, what strategies theyelop in reaction to the transformations and how their reactions and strategiare expressed in everyday live. By focusing on spatial strategies in the configuring of Vladivostok'urban landscape, I want to understand how spatial mobility aplace-making are connected to cultural changes and new patterns of consumption.
